IT IS disturbing that neither of the two leaders with the most political power in the UK are prepared to put the people first: they do not want to give voters a say in the kind of Brexit (or non-Brexit) they want.

Boris Johnson because he is so bull-headed and arrogant; Jeremy Corbyn because he is so bull-headed and arrogant - except his arrogance is focussed on him delivering a softer Brexit. This obstinacy has to be the most frightening aspect for everyone during the last three years of political brinkmanship.

There is an inevitability that the log-jam of Brexit will end up with a people's vote on the kind of Brexit (or non-Brexit) that British citizens want. More and more people are coming over to the idea of campaigning for Remain during a second referendum.

When that people's vote happens, if the government was very brave it would say that any nation voting to Remain in the EU would have the right to follow up with an immediate referendum on remaining or leaving the UK. Unless, of course, all the nations voted to Remain which would reunite England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland back into a united kingdom. Happy days.
