David Still, a career immigration service official, has been named interim director of the San Francisco office of the new Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Services, the former INS office, which serves 49 northern and central California counties.

The district office oversees the San Jose sub-office of the immigration agency.

Still, 51, of San Francisco, joined the INS as an inspector in Calexico in 1977 after graduating from California Polytechnic State University-San Luis Obispo. He moved to the San Francisco district office in 1981, serving in various positions including acting district director.

The Immigration and Naturalization Service was recently split into two functions, immigration services and enforcement, under the new Department of Homeland Security, and as of March 1, became the Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Services.
