Body

In a 5-3 ruling issued Monday, the U.S. Supreme Court struck down much of Arizona's tough immigration law, SB 1070, but upheld a key provision allowing officers to question people about their immigration status.

Here's what the court concluded:

Arizona police cannot make warrantless arrests and jail immigrants just because officers believe they are deportable

Arizona cannot make it a state crime for illegal immigrants to seek work or to be in the state without carrying federal documentation

Arizona police can briefly detain and question someone they've stopped and contact federal agents if they have reasonable suspicion they are in the country illegally

Voted in the majority: Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Stephen Breyer, Anthony Kennedy and Sonia Sotomayor

Dissented: Justices Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas would have upheld all of Arizona's law; Samuel Alito wanted to sustain two of the three provisions the majority rejected.

Not participating: Justice Elena Kagan recused herself.

Reactions:

"I remain concerned that the sole remaining provision -- the requirement that police check the immigration status of a person they've otherwise stopped or arrested -- raises serious constitutional concerns that will result in civil rights violations against citizens and immigrants alike." -- U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-San Francisco

"I am disappointed by the Supreme Court's decision. ... Today's ruling essentially puts an end to immigration enforcement since the states no longer can step in and fill the void created by the Obama administration." -- U.S. House Judiciary Chairman Lamar Smith, R-Texas
